Before the birth of Christ, even before the time of Homer (approximately 850 B.C.), writers and their writings were questioned. Although objections vary, foremost grounds have usually been religious, political or obscene or pornographic. Penalties have ranged from censure and removal of books, to fines and/or imprisonment for writers, booksellers and publishers, to the burning of books and even a few authors.

Where possible, the following list is coded (See Legend below) to indicate the reason(s) that have been given to seek the banning of each title. In the case of juvenile titles, many were questioned as to suitability at particular grade levels. With regard to obscenity, that category includes some titles thought to be objectionable if not actually obscene. Uncoded titles came from several sources and the reasons were not specified.

In each instance the number(s) immediately follows the title.
